

LITERARY NOTES.

The October number of Harper's Magazine will contain a picturesque article by M. E. W. S. on "Certain New-York Houses." It will have several dainty illustrations. It deals with the houses of E. W. Stevens, D. O. Miller, and others, and is full of luxurious and beautiful details.

Targenell's latest story, "Love's Triumph," is a purely romantic tale, suggested by an old copy of Boccaccio which the novelist found at his country-house when last in Russia. After reading and rereading the book, the Russian became convinced that the Italian was master of the real art of telling a story, and he therefore immediately changed his own method.

Our Continent has lately purchased Potter's Americana Monthly, and its most attractive graces will be added to the columns of Judge Tourgee's weekly. The last number of Our Continent contains an excellent copy of S. A. Schelf's portrait in fine engraving of "The Quaker Soldier," William Penn. The accompanying article has other interesting cuts of places associated with Penn.

In his commentary upon the second part of "Faust," just published in Germany, K. J. Schroer draws attention to a fact which, we think, has not been pointed out before by interpreters of Goethe's masterpiece. It is that Hans Sachs, of whom a well-known verse says that wrote a poem, entitled "The Wondrous Counterfeite of the Emperor Maximilian" and printed in 1561, in which the spirit of Iskra, after many incantations, is made to rise before the Emperor. The resemblance between this and the well-known scene in the second part of "Faust" leads Schroer to think that Goethe borrowed the idea from the poem, if such it can be called, of the old "Meisteringer."

Gabriel Rossetti, the father of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, the poet, was an Italian of the most liberal political views, and a writer of noble patriotic songs which were sung with enthusiasm in the streets of Naples in the time of Ferdinand, and which came very near being the death of the author. Miss Robinson, in a charming article on Rossetti the son in the October Harper, describes the fashion in which the father escaped from Naples. Lady Moore, the wife of the English admiral Sir Graham Moore, was a warm admirer of Rossetti's songs, and hearing that he was in danger, would not rest till her husband had helped the patriot to escape. Sir Graham ascertained Rossetti's hiding place, and with a fellow officer set out in a carriage, the English being of course beyond suspicion. They found Rossetti dressed in an British uniform, which they had concealed in the carriage, and taking him to the shore, sent him safely on his way in a ship bound for Malta. Signor Rossetti settled in London as Italian Professor in King's College and married Frances Poldori, daughter of Aliberti's secretary and sister of the young physician who travelled with Byron.
